

Attendance, Fiction, October 30, 2007

Name:

Sentence:

[Bill Lychack]

Once upon a time there was a man who did everything backwards.

[Andrew Richardson]

He married a woman who did everything upside-down.

[Dan Silva]

Together, they made some confused children.

[Evan Hawk]

Timmy would always water the dog.

[Tantum Collins]

Who, in turn, would walk the flowers.

[Maggie Maffione]

And these flowers bloomed inside out, nourished by the rain that fell up.

[Osei Wilks]

Understandably, the female child was perfectly normal, the perfect irony in a confused world.

[Paul McCarthy]

She occasionally went into the corner and spoke in tongues, but, within the context, this wasn't so unusual.

[David Koppel]

She would always ask her dad, the man who did everything backwards, "Where do babies come from?"

[Emily Cokorinos]

And he told her, but she didn't believe him, because she knew not to trust her father; it was just a game she played with him, always asking questions.

[Becca Zinsmeister]

However, she knew that at some point her game would end and reality would strike.

[Erika Langley]

The backwards reality of her forward moving life.